Patriotism is a natural and important sentiment. Upon it depends the defence of the State, the welfare of society, and the safety and happiness of the individual. The foundation of patriotism is local attachment, - a fondness for one's kindred and neighborhood. My friends, we should be less than patriots, less than men, did we forget that spot of earth from whence our wandering feet departed. This is why, though we are true and loyal to the Great Republic, our hearts yet turn to our New England homes, faithfully as the trembling needle to the pole. This is why, as grateful children, we are met in memory of the men who gave us a home and a country, upon the day when first they stood upon the soil of the strange, new world. We of New England, without disparagement of others, may indulge a just and honest pride in the stock from whence we have sprung. Our fathers possessed a force of character, with distinguishing and enviable traits, which has moulded and fixed forever the spirit and tendencies of the community which they planted. In what the peculiarities of that character consisted, and how it chanced to seek the new world as the theatre of its display, are topics to which we will briefly turn. Our fathers were Puritans. The Pilgrims to the new world were the...
