Excerpt: . CHAPTER III AIRS AND GRACES In this chapter, which from its nature cannot pretend to be exhaustive, we are concerned with certain ornamental foibles; ebullitions of animal spirits incident to young ladies and gentlemen in the first blush of printed publicity. Our quotations, it is true, do not all correspond strictly to this description; but the reader has already observed that the worst faults can often be quoted from the best authors; it remains for him to reflect that such faults can be tolerated in them--and only in them. Habit, too, has something to do with the matter; some of the journalists quoted below could perhaps tell us whether the downward path of inversion, entered in extreme youth, is easily abandoned. It seems a fair inference from contemporary literature that the negative equipment of many writers may be summed up in three rules:...
