Excerpt from Notes on Horticultural Nomenclature: Some Suggestions for the Nurseryman Fruit Grower, Gardener, Seed, Grower, Plant Breeder and Student of Horticulture The first requisite to the study of any science or art is a satisfactory nomenclature. This is a widely recognized principle. The students of such sciences as physics, astronomy and botany have spent a great deal of time and effort in selecting and defining most minutely the terms necessary to their descriptions and discussions. And whether it be cause or effect, the present undeniable crudity of horticultural nomenclature is evidence that pomology, vegetable culture and floriculture still fall measurably short of being sciences. Science is said to be classified knowledge; but before we can classify our knowledge of horticultural varieties, we must have those varieties unequivocally named and accurately described. We are fond of saying that horticulture is coming to be a science; but it certainly falls far short, in this respect, of what it ought to be. A reasonable nomenclature assigns to each entity, be it object, process, species or variety, a separate and distinctive name. In horticulture, our attention is fixed chiefly on varieties, and varieties are hard to define; but each one, as we know and describe it, ought to have one name and one only. In other words, one variety must not pass under several names; nor must one name stand for two or more distinct varieties. It would be easy to mention examples of both mistakes. The well-known apple, Ortley, for instance, has nearly two dozen synonymous names, such as White Bellflower, Ohio Favorite, Detroit, Greasy Pippin, Inman, Yellow Pippin, Jersey Greening, Warren Pippin, etc. About the Publisher Forgotten Books...
