Not illustrated. 1897 Excerpt: .--rather than for a book which, when perfect, could not have found room enough within it, as is demonstrable by measurements¹. After the criticism to which the current theory as to the origin of the manuscript has been submitted by the learned Doctor, it would hardly be safe to uphold any longer its superiority in point of age on account of its connexion with the alleged Patrician silver shrine. On the other hand, the difficulty is experienced of pronouncing decisively on the age of the manuscript from the nature of its text and writing. The version of the Gospels, as far as that can be made out, is, like the text we usually meet with in the copies of the Holy Writ made by Irish scribes, traceable to the Vulgate, but with occasional readings from pre-Hieronymian versions². The writing, in a regularly shaped semi-uncial of a distinctively Celtic type, does not afford any criteria by which we are enabled to assign the manuscript with confidence to any particular period previous to circa A. D. 800, for the simple reason that there does not exist sufficient material in general for the establishment of canons of criticism regarding the evolution of Irish script before that date. Until we possess 1 Transactions R. I. A., vol. XXX, parts VII and VIII, pp. 305, 306. Op. cit, p. 3i0. GOSPELS OF MAC D URN AN a greater number of dated examples from the earlier centuries, it would be an...
